Donald Dyal, Ph.D., has been dean of the Texas Tech University Libraries since 2001. He completed his undergraduate work at the University of Washington, Seattle, received a master’s degree from Brigham Young University and a doctorate from Texas A&M University.

Prior to coming to Texas Tech, he spent some 28 years at Texas A&M University where his most recent duties included serving as associate dean for development and special collections, directing the Latin American Library Initiative and serving as adjunct professor of history.

Dyal also served as a commissioned officer in the U.S. Army Reserves, at the rank of captain.

He is the author of nine books and more than 100 monographs.

He has received numerous awards and honors. In 2006, he received the Lubbock Association for Women in Communications’ Headliner Award, along with the West Texas Coalition for the George W. Bush Presidential Library. In 2008, Dyal was the sole nominee by President George W. Bush to direct his presidential library.

Under his leadership, the University Libraries’ digital resources such as electronic journals, books and databases have increased exponentially in order to meet the evolving needs of teaching and learning, research and service – not only for Texas Tech but also worldwide.

Dyal and his wife, Lila, have six children (all of them girls except for five) and 12 grandchildren. He likes old cars, old boats, old planes, old trains, old houses and old Levis. He does not like old donuts, tuna fish casseroles or cat food.
